TIP OF THE MONTH:

When making my candles I use the liquid dyes. I get the candle the color that I am happy with and then I write down the number of drops used per pound of wax to achieve the color of a particular scent. Once this is done I take a little of the extra wax and place it into the cavity of one of the clamshells. On the outside (lid) of the clamshell container I use a piece of tape to write down the scent and the number of drops of liquid dye I used per pound to get this color. I then have not only the exact color to match the next batch of candles with but also I have the scent, number of drops and all that I need in the clamshell mold. No papers to mess with or to mess up. I have all of my scents together and I can store this in a drawer for future reference. I have each cavity filled with a different scent to make the most of the molds and since I use these strictly for my reference I don't worry about the scents mixing. It is a very easy and convenient way to have everything right there at my fingertips.
